

NUR 303: Pathophysiological Bases of Nursing Practice

A study of the pathophysiology of selected disease processes, building on the student's knowledge of human anatomy and physiology, microbiology, and chemistry. Addresses pathophysiological changes at the cellular, organ, system, and multi-system levels. Incorporates nursing interventions specific to the disease processes studied. Includes clinical findings and implications for health across the health-illness continuum and the lifespan.

Credits: Credits 3

Class Hours: Class Hours

3

Prerequisites:

Prerequisites

Admission to the Nursing Major

Semester Offered:

Semester Offered

Offered fall and spring semesters.